"Wrong-Way Driving" Reduced Sharply

Wrong-way driving on Virginia's interstate and four-lane divided primary highways has been reduced sharply, but still represents a major and sometimes fatal hazard, a new study by the State Department of Highways and Transportation showed today.

J. P. Mills, Jr., the department's traffic and safety engineer, said the number of such reported incidents declined from 135 in the six months between June 1 and November 30, 1971, soon after the problem became evident, to 58 in the same period of 1977.

The number of accidents resulting from wrong-way driving decreased from 35 to 21, while injuries stemming from the accidents were reduced by more than half, from 37 to 14. The number of traffic deaths rose from four in the 1971 period to five during the six months in 1977, however.

"It is readily apparent that real danger continues to exist because of the wrong-way driver," Mills said.

He attributed the reduction in the number of such incidents to several factors, including new traffic engineering procedures, police enforcement, and educational efforts which have helped to make motorists aware of the danger.

Soon after the problem was recognized in the early 1970s, highway engineers and state police began joint studies to seek corrective measures. Among new traffic engineering techniques adopted were large red "wrong way" signs, black-and-white signs with arrows pointing in the proper direction of travel, and additional painted pavement markings. Mills said that state troopers now have questionnaires which they complete when they observe a wrong-way driving incident or investigate a traffic accident resulting from such an incident.

But he said information gathered thus far indicates that it will be a difficult problem to solve completely.

Of the 58 motorists involved in the wrong-way incidents in the June through November period last year, 27 - - or 47 per cent - - were drunk or had been drinking. At least two others had made U-turns in order to travel in the wrong direction, and 27 had entered the wrong traffic lanes at interchanges or intersections. Mills said that in some cases it was impossible to determine the origin of the incidents.

Of the total accidents in the 1977 period, seven occurred on interstate highways, resulting in four injuries and three fatalities. The other 14 occurred on the divided primary routes, and caused 10 injuries and two deaths, Mills said.

EATING WELL

Children and TV Commercials

The Council on Children, Media and Merchandising for the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs has conducted a valuable service by printing a publication entitled Bitter TV: Your Child and Food Commercials. It may be purchased by writing to the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

This report points out that children are exposed yearly to between 8,500 and 13,000 food and drink commercials. Children's eating habits are influenced by the commercials and in general the influence is bad. In some cases the commercials are not exactly true. For example, many television commercials will mention that a particular food provides "energy". They fail to mention that the food provides calories. It may be that the term calories is avoided because so many people are on diets and trying to lose weight. The television commercials suggest that a particular food will make a person energetic; however, they fail to mention that calories do not always make a person energetic: they may simply make him overweight. Take for example the person who is already obese, eating more calories will not make them able to climb mountains or walk faster. Dr. Jay Tepperman, professor of experimental medicine, State University of New York make the following statement regarding the use of the term "energy" in the commercials: "Some of the energy claims that are made in children's advertising are . . . in the category of magic . . . attributing extraordinary properties to food."

Nonsmokers Have Rights

Smokers have a right to pursue their habit. Nonsmokers have a right to clean air. Sometimes these rights clash.

Confined places such as airplanes, meeting rooms, elevators and restaurants present special problems. Studies show that in smoke-filled rooms the level of carbon monoxide may be in excess of the legal limits for maximum air pollution.

The American Medical Association's pamphlet: Smoking: Facts You Should Know, points out that a person doesn't have to be a smoker himself to suffer ill effects from cigarets. A nonsmoker in the company of a smoker breathes in smoke from the burning end of the cigaret as well as the exhaled smoke. Some individuals actually are allergic to tobacco smoke and may suffer smoke-caused asthma attacks.

If smoking is a personal right, it carries with it the responsibility of respecting the rights of the nonsmoker, too.

Nonsmokers who suffer from allergies of diverse causes and other nonsmokers find that tobacco smoke causes eye irritation, nasal symptoms, headache and coughing.

Inhaling second-hand smoke increases the heart rate, blood pressure and level of carbon monoxide in the blood. This is particularly dangerous for those with heart and respiratory conditions.

An added note: Smoking is unsafe in more ways than one. People are killed or injured every day as a result of fires caused by careless smokers. The safety hazards of smoking are enormous, affecting many innocent nonsmokers as well as smokers.
